Synodality

My concern as Pope has been to encourage such overflows within the Church by reinvigorating the ancient practice of synodality. I have wanted to develop this ancient process not just for the sake of the Church but as a service to a humanity that is so often locked in paralyzed disagreements.

The term comes from the Greek syn-odos, "walking together" and this is its goal: not so much to forge agreement as to recognize, honor, and reconcile differences on a higher plane where the best of each can be retained. In the dynamic of a synod, differences are expressed and polished until you reach, if not consensus, a harmony that holds on to the sharp notes of its differences. This what happens in music: with seven different musical notes with their sharps and flats a harmony is created that allows for a better articulation of the singularities of each note. Therein lies its beauty: the harmony that results can be complex, rich, and unexpected. In the church the one who brings about that harmony is the Holy Spirit.

I like to see the beginning of ecclesial synodality in the early Church when the apostles gathered to wrestle with a questions that divided them: Should non-Jewish people be bound by Jewish laws and customs such as circumcision when they become Christian? After discussion and prayers and some bitter disagreement, they pondered the way that God had worked signs and wonders among them through the Gentiles, for God is recognized in the experience of real life. They declared that "it has seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us" (Acts 15:28) not to impose on non-Jewish Christians the regulations of Jewish law.
