Good Self Awareness

The act of "lowering myself" imitates the coming-down and coming-close of the Word of God. It is the humility of confessing our faults, not to punish ourselves which would make the same mistake of putting ourselves in charge-but to acknowledge our dependence on God and our need of His grace. Rather than accusing others for their failures and limitations. I find some fault or attitude in myself. And I then turn to my Creator and my God and ask Him for the grace I need to move forward, confident that He loves me and cares for me. Rather than close myself off to God, I open the door for Him to act in and through me, because God never imposes on our freedom; He must be invited in. And I find, when this happens, that rather than find fault in my brother or sister, I see in him or her one who is also struggling and in need of help, and I offer myself in service to them.

Accusing myself, confident of God's mercy, reveals the bad spirit, which loses its foothold. Often what divides us comes not from holding different views but from the bad spirit hidden behind those views, which remains hidden by the contagious cycle of accusation and counteraccusation. Just as what separates me from my brother and sister is my (and their) spirit of self-sufficiency and superiority, so what unites us is our shared insufficiency, our mutual dependence on God and on each other. We are no longer rivals, but members of the same family. We might argue and disagree, but we are no longer caught in a vicious spiral of mutual antagonism. We do not think the same, but we are part of the same Body moving together.
