A People's Story

Just as a people comes to an awareness of its shared dignity in times of struggles, in war and hardship, so, too a people can forget that awareness. A people can become oblivious to its own history. In times of peace and prosperity, there is always the risk that the people might dissolve into a mere mass, with no unifying principle to bind them.

When this happens, the center lives at the expense of the margins, people divide into competing tribes, and the exploited and disrespected might burn with resentment at the injustices. Rather than thinking of ourselves as members of a people, we have competition for dominance, turning contrapositions into contradictions. Because, in these circumstances, the people no longer see the natural world as their inheritance to be nurtured; the powerful seize and extract all they can from it, while putting nothing back. Indifference, egotism, a culture of complacent well-being, and deep divisions within society, spilling out into violence - all these are signs that a people has lost awareness of its dignity. It has ceased to believe in itself.

A people thus weakened and divided easily falls prey to very different kinds of colonization. But even when not occupied by a foreign power, the people has, in a larger sense, already surrendered its dignity. It has ceased to be a protagonist of its own history.

“Let us Dream” by Pope Francis.
